

OGDEN NEWS

Ogden Office, 203 Eccles Building, Telephone 14.

Ogden, Jan. 5.

EARLY MORNING FIRE.

Meyers & Shurtliff Cigar Store Burned.

The frame building belonging to the D. H. Peery estate and located at 349 Twenty-fourth street was destroyed by fire about 3 o'clock yesterday morning, together with the entire stock of Meyers & Shurtliff, two young men who recently opened a cigar and news stand in the place. Clarence Meyers and Jack McCarthy were sleeping in the place and barely escaped with their clothing. The fire probably originated from a cigar stump thrown amongst some waste paper.

The loss on the building is estimated at $150 and on the stock at $400. The building was fully protected by insurance and the stock also, unless the same exceeds $400.

ROLAPP CLERK AGAIN.

IS NOT INSTANT DEATH.

Physicians and Scientists Excited Over Electrocuting.

(Boston Post.)
According to the theory of Dr. De Amazez of this city, either Storti or Umilian, recently electrocuted, could have been brought back to life, had the proper steps been taken, say, within two hours after they were taken from the electric chair.

Professor Trowbridge of Harvard believes there is much in Dr. De Amazez's theory and that it will bear looking into. Dr. De Amazez is a graduate of the University of Genoa.

Electrocution, according to the doctor's theory, simply causes an entire paralysis of the victim's vital forces. Could he secure the body of a person who has been "legally killed" in the electric chair at "legally killed" state prison, within two hours after the current has done its work, he is satisfied that he could restore life.

Had Warden Bridges permitted an experiment to be tried on the body of Luigi Storti, who was electrocuted in the Charlestown prison at 12:29 o'clock on the morning of Dec. 17, Dr. De Amazez believes Storti would have been alive today.

In France some years ago, Dr. De Amazez says, a man received 10,000 volts of electricity, and was restored to life.

"If the Frenchman was restored, why could Storti and Umilian not have been?" asked Dr. De Amazez. "Because," he said, answering his own question, "no attempts were made to restore them from the effects of the shocks they had received in the electric chair."

When the currents from the death machinery enter the body, Dr. De Amazez believes, paralysis at once sets in, and little or no pain is felt by the victim. What life remains in the body, if his theory that life does remain is correct, is not any more apparent than that which is frequently restored in a person who has apparently died from drowning.

"My investigations have convinced me," said the doctor, "that proper remedies will bring life back to the electrocuted person, if those remedies are applied properly within two hours of the electrocution. The arms must be constantly moved to restore respiration, the tongue must be moved, a tube must be placed in the throat to permit air to pass to the lungs, and you must work on the spine."

Then there are strong stimulants which can be administered to cause a movement of the heart, and the victim should be treated to injections of hot water, and all the time some one must keep pressing on his stomach. It may be necessary to keep this up for an hour, or perhaps more, but in the end, I believe, there will be a return of life.

"It has been proven beyond a doubt that life can be restored to animals which have been subjected to a heavy charge of electricity."

"Death, in my opinion, came to the men who were electrocuted in Charlestown prison undoubtedly from the effects of the electricity sent into them, but not immediately, their lives fading away, I believe, as they would have from the effects of many of the powerful drugs which would cause death if some means are not taken to counteract them."

Dr. F. A. Harris, medical examiner for the district in which the prison is, and who was one of the witnesses who testified that Storti died after three shocks were given him, says there was some conversation in Warden Bridges' office, before the electrocution, about the possibilities of resuscitation, and by his orders, the body was kept at the prison until signs of decomposition had set in.

"Decomposition is the only positive sign of death," the doctor said, when asked about Dr. De Amazez's theory, "and I believe that those signs should appear in the body of Storti before it was taken by his friends."

"I do not believe in electricity as a means of punishment, anyway," continued Dr. Harris. "If they are anxious to kill murderers painlessly, it seems to me it would be better to give them morphine and then turn on the gas. Then there would be no pain and sure death."

Professor Trowbridge believes that there should be a thorough investigation of Dr. De Amazez's theory before any more electrocutions are permitted in Massachusetts.

"There is a strong doubt in my mind as to whether electricity causes instant death," said Professor Trowbridge. "If I were going to be electrocuted, I should like my body to be cremated."

"You can resuscitate a person who is apparently dead from drowning if you take him quickly. I think it would be possible to resuscitate a person who has been electrocuted. It is a question that cannot be said positively," said Professor Trowbridge. "But it is probably true that life remains in the body after it is taken from the electric chair, and that it gradually fades away because no efforts are made to retain it."

Professor Trowbridge told of a case with which he had personal experience. In a place in which the professor happened to be, one of the employees received a shock of 500 volts, accompanied by a strong current. He fell to the floor unconscious, there was a deathly pallor over his face and hands, and it did not seem that anything could be done to bring him back to life.

Professor Trowbridge believed there was hope, and he went right to work. He moved the man's arms backward and forward to cause artificial respiration, poured cold water down his spine, and within a minute there were signs of life. Soon after the man had fully recovered, and he is alive today.

"Electrocution," said the professor in answer to a question, "seems more efficacious than hanging, but, as I said before, it is something that can bear considerable looking into."

HOW HE GOT EVEN.
Applicant For Place Told Ingalls What He Thought of Him.

(New York Times.)
M. E. Ingalls, the railroad magnate of the middle west, whose interests are more or less allied with the Vanderbilt system, is no exception to prominent men of business, inasmuch as he maintains an anteroom where callers are required to state their errands before being admitted to the official stronghold.

Not long since, however, one individual swept the entire arrangement aside by stating past the outer secretaries with an air of authority which disarmed them. He boldly pushed open the door to the sanctum and entered. Taken by surprise, Mr. Ingalls looked up and beheld a tall, bronzed personage, bearing every mark of rural citizenship, surveying the apartment with an inquiring eye. The newcomer demanded sharply:

"Is Ingalls here?"

"I am Ingalls," returned the magnate, laconically.

The stranger strode to the desk and threw down an envelope.

"Letter for you," he said curtly.

"Do you know what is in this letter?" he demanded.

"Yes. The station agent in my town said if I'd fetch that to you I'd get a job."

"Indeed! Do you not think it would be more becoming in you as an applicant for employment at least to knock at the door before entering and remove your hat while in the office? And, further, would it not be more seemly in you to inquire for Mister Ingalls rather than for Ingalls?"

Beneath his merited rebuke the man moved not a muscle.

"Give me the letter," said he, soberly.

Mr. Ingalls promptly handed over the letter, and the visitor went out, closing the door behind him without a word. While the clerk were still grinning over the incident, there was a timid knock at the door. The door opened. There stood the same individual. He entered with an obsequious bow, carefully wiped his feet, removed his hat and meekly asked:

"Is Mr. Ingalls here?"

"Ah, my young friend," said he graciously. "That is better. What can I do for you?"

The countryman drew himself up with a ferocious glare. "Do for me?" he yelled. "Do for me? You can go to h—, you little bald-headed duffer; that's what you kin do for me!"

And he withdrew, slamming the door behind him.
